What's new:

Review English: Marking a milestone in the evolution of supersonic flight, the Air Force's first flight of the Lockheed Martin-operated Evolution X aircraft demonstrated the trend towards cheaper and lighter, yet more capable military aircraft. Improvements to its flying characteristics enabled the aircraft to fly with the second time, and subsequent flights have demonstrated a further 8% increase in loiter time. In June, 2010, Air Force leaders announced their intent to replace four of the AGM-88R Long-Range Stand-Off Air-Launched Missiles (LRSO-A) deployed on the Tactical Ejection Vehicle (Aegis) on the C-5 Galaxy used for long-range airlift, with a few "lightweight, durable, and capable" anti-access/area-denial missiles. The United States Air Force (USAF) awarded prime contractor Lockheed Martin a $130 million contract for four more Evolutions, and, with the prospect of a major procurement, an aviation industry that has been struggling recently went back to its roots to help evolve the aircraft which -"to put it politely"- were pretty close in concept and capabilities to the Convair YF-110 - a world-renowned air-superiority aircraft of the 1960's and 70's - the aircraft that launched the industry. The total goal of this sale is 55 airplanes and a lot of innovative technologies to modernize the 21st century fleet of fighter aircraft. The new platform, designed to achieve a superior performance, increased weapon capacity, and advanced survivability, is supposed to last up to 50 years and contribute to the country's ability to project power, survey countries, build foreign relationships, and save American lives. A reduction in the cost of range and survivability would allow the US to focus on the application of newer, more advanced technologies on F-35s and to conduct a "21st-century fight against an air power that is willing and able to "destroy and absorb." Lockheed's stated goal is to make the first air-superiority jetcarrier into such a plane. But Evolution is neither the work of Lockheed nor an aircraft developed at its secretive Skunk Works. It is the result of an unique joint effort between AAR's aerospace Rafael's Evolutions is a light, versatile supersonic

Please leave any feedback and support, we love to hear your voice!POWERFUL: The story of the woman who saved Fukushima By Kyodo News staff in Japan Fri, May 29, 2013 - Page 1 Late on March 11, 2011, Tepco power workers were on an exercise to repair a damaged cooling system at the Fukushima No. 1 nuclear power plant. An unidentified employee, standing on a temporary platform, suddenly fell off the platform and tumbled down into a building. His fall was covered in detail by numerous TV stations and newspapers, and another employee was forced to jump into the building to save him. Wearing a high-visibility raincoat and rubber boots, he jumped down into the building holding up the man with his arms. "Nuclear worker falls into building, being saved by colleague," was the headline for the Sunday edition of the main Asahi Shimbun newspaper on the same day. The man's identity was kept secret until today, when his name was disclosed as having been Takuya Inoue, a 48-year-old junior general manager of the plant's No. 4 power unit. Inoue was promoted from the power plant's No. 3 unit to No. 4 at the beginning of April 2011. He worked in the No. 4 unit until his transfer. However, the story was doubted by some journalists, who pointed out he was a man, while the falling worker was a woman, thus raising the question of why a female colleague was present at the scene of the accident. Following the media outcry, the Ministry of Economy, Trade and Industry ordered Tepco to publish details of the incident in an effort to prevent such incidents from occurring in the future. Inoue and his female colleague had been working on the platform to remove a pipe from the building of the No. 2 nuclear reactor containment building, but she became stuck because her clothes became caught in the pipe's handrail, and the two were forced to crawl inside the building. To pull her out, he and a worker from the No. 3 power unit removed the pipe from the wall
