What's new:

I pulled the game off the shelf this morning and began to play again. I always enjoy a well-researched game, one that can incite discussion in our group. Anna Lee talked about the lack of female characters in the game. Later, Colleen commented how most of the non-player characters are male. On a wider societal level, I felt like this conclusion was true, but I also felt that it could not be the intent of the developers. The game starts with a male mage in a world made by women.

They have made the world but they have created it through a male lens. My first thought is that I would like to re-play the game a second time. I would want to go back in time and speak to the women, as women, in order to find their perspective. What if, in my initial playthrough, I ended up being the storyteller? What if I had decided to take the path of love instead of power? What if I turned my craft of magic towards the restoration of the world? This leaves me in a position of dissatisfaction. I don't want to totally invalidate my play-through. I do want to amplify those storylines that the developers had not intended for me. I want to inform the game I am now playing about a narrative from a female perspective. I would like to participate in the afterworld of the game-world where I could evoke a different cast of characters. I do want to think about what I can do to change the vision of this world that the developers have created. I have not yet determined if I want to challenge that vision or get active within the game. Each game, each single-player game, can have these narrative possibilities without needing to change anything about the game. If I find that the developers have not taken me seriously as an individual, then I will just think of the options for this game that I am now playing. I AM WONDERFUL We are all so wonderfully imperfect. It is the nature of the world in which we live. As our story unfolds, we see that the other characters are doing all kinds of things imperfectly or not at all. I wonder if they are doing something else. I can imagine that the devs have invented a space, a game space, and not necessarily one that reflects the world around me. It could be the other way around, it could be that I have changed the world for them
