“With this technology, our gameplay team was able to really focus on player physics and physics in game, all with a nod to real-world player movements,” said Rob Pardo, Executive Producer on the FIFA team. “For the first time ever in the franchise, we’ve taken the player data we capture, brought it into the game and really shone a light on how they move in-game and then used it to push the bounds of player creativity.” “The FIFA franchise has always been one of the pioneers in VR content, and we’re excited to see how players in the next generation of hardware will experience some of their favorite moments in a whole new way.” — Nick Earl, Co-Chairman, EA SPORTS

Check out the FIFA 22 gameplay trailer below. For the first time ever in the FIFA franchise, movement data captured from real-world players in motion capture suits has been brought into the game and has been used to create a holistic, realistic movement system that powers gameplay throughout FIFA 22. Throughout the gameplay sequence, players will notice countless combinations of footwork, physical actions, and movement that create a truly authentic football experience. Players can see how their movement tendencies, individual playing styles, and even the environment they move in impacts the gameplay experience. For example, the physics of the pitch change the way a player approaches his opponent and open up a series of new options. The ability for players to make real-time decisions on the pitch depending on their environment is now at their fingertips, allowing for new tactics and styles of play. Players can also see individual touches and successful passes come to life through the physics engine. Pitches become dynamic and players are able to control the ball with unique behaviors and movement features, such as stamina loss, pass power and dribbling effects. Players can also make creative and more realistic decisions when facing a defender. While preparing to receive a pass, players will be able to react more efficiently to defenders’ movement and pressure. Players can also see more intelligent markers, which can help them control the ball and find their teammates. To accompany the FIFA 22 gameplay trailer, the FIFA team is also releasing a new behind the scenes video to give fans a closer look at how motion capture and physics work in the game, as well as how the team is using the data collected from actual real-world players.
