The term is most commonly used in North America, where many hot springs have bathhouses which allow visitors to soak in the natural hot water. In many cases, springs have bathhouses in the dry area around the spring itself, which are often referred to as "dry bathhouses". In other cases, springs may have bathhouses in nearby towns or city. History Prior to the coming of the railroads, many people in the western United States went to "mountain resorts" for health and recreation. The construction of railroads in the 19th and early 20th centuries brought a growing number of tourists to these resorts, such as Yellowstone National Park. Several railroad hotels were built in the parks, and bathhouses were provided as part of the services provided at these hotels. The bathhouses remained in business until the 1950s, when declining use and the development of many new health spas and saunas caused them to fade in popularity. However, the state parks in many of the parks still have bathhouses which are still used for bathing, and there are few public baths in the United States. Common practices In many states or cities, a public hot spring is located in or near a bathhouse. Public hot springs may be used without permission, particularly by people who are not paying customers of the resort. This usage of hot springs is considered rude, and is normally frowned upon by the owners of the bathhouses. Older bathhouses tended to be simple one-room buildings containing a hot spring pool or whirlpool. Some bathhouses, such as Prospector's
