Oxidation-induced modification of the insulin receptor on the surface of human lymphocytes. A possible mechanism for impaired insulin action. In this study, we have examined the effect of cell surface oxidation on the binding affinity of insulin to isolated human lymphocytes. The number of insulin receptors and their affinity for insulin were determined by immunoadsorption. The number of cell surface receptors was not altered by cell surface oxidation. The total number of insulin receptors remained constant.

However, the affinity of insulin was reduced by approximately 60% by cell surface oxidation. The modification was effective only when the oxidizing agent, peroxy-nitrite, was present in the buffer solution during the immunoadsorption procedure. It is suggested that insulin and its receptor are prone to oxidation, and that the reduced affinity of the insulin receptor for insulin may contribute to the reduced responsiveness to insulin in diabetic patients.
