as well as streaming services, the amount of time we spend on social media is also a source of carbon emissions. a recent study from stanford university found that people who have facebook accounts produce more than four times the carbon footprint of those who don't. the study also revealed that the average american produced a total of 2,300kg of carbon dioxide in 2013 from social media, that is over three times the amount produced by the average american in 1992. a recent european union climate change action plan aims to increase the share of renewable energy in the eu's energy mix from 22% today to 27% by 2030. the eu says this will allow the eu to meet its 2050 carbon target, a target the uk is planning to miss even under its own carbon reduction commitments. sms is an old technology now. but it is still a technology which is used widely around the world. it is estimated that the average person sends around 150 texts a month. in china, where sms use is by far the highest, it is estimated that 2.3 billion texts were sent in 2013 alone. this adds up to 1.2 million tonnes of carbon dioxide emissions each year. and that is just texting. don't forget the thousands of sms messages sent each year using whatsapp and other messaging apps. and mobile phone data is a different story, but lets stick with text for the moment. taking to the skies is another obvious choice when it comes to cutting emissions. planes emit large amounts of greenhouses gases in the form of carbon dioxide. but it can be worth it if you travel a lot. the average londoner flies a lot more than they drive, which means they are responsible for more emissions per mile than a los angeles resident. a study by the national aeronautics and space administration (nasa) showed that for a family of four, flying 10 times a year is more environmentally friendly than driving 4,000 miles a year.
