DNG Converter is a tool that was revealed at last year's MAX conference. At that time, it seemed like a likely feature that portends for future versions of Photoshop. DNG Converter is like the DNG tag in the raw file. Its job is to render the ISO image file as a TIFF file. In this release, DNG Converter behaves much the same as other image formats in the creation of TIFF files. DNG Converter is intended for raw files only. Unfortunately, there's no room to add a feature like the raw TIFF codec in Photoshop. This is a shame, as the compression provided by the raw TIFF codec is better than most of the file formats used by the Graphics Magick library. When will Adobe make room for the codec in its library? I'd call this an important new feature. Adobe offers a selection standard that is worth revisiting. Adobe's standard is simpler, more powerful, and enables you to select more objects in a file. For example, in a 2D clipping box, you can select more objects than by using the standard selection tool. The trick is to lock the selection to a particular layer. Adobe calls the new selection option Live Clipping, and it's a big deal. The $899 price tag may seem like a lot at a time when photo editing used to be almost free. However, if you're a serious professional, a video editor, or a still photographer doing the work for which Photoshop is used, I think you'll benefit from the upgrades to the software. My advice is to hold off on buying a camera until Adobe Photoshop releases its next version. Sharpening is a process that takes place at the stage of processing an image that is deeper in the pipeline. Post-production sharpening is a lot more computationally intensive than pre-production sharpening, so it may take Adobe much longer to implement settings for new cameras.
