Human decidual cells synthesize and secreted metalloproteinases and are believed to cause tissue destruction during parturition. The present study examined the ability of human decidual cells to synthesize and secrete collagenases in an in vitro system and the effects of growth factors and serum on expression of the collagenases. During culture, human decidual cells detached from the extracellular matrix, and synthesized alpha 2(I) collagenase and a metalloproteinase with an electrophoretic mobility similar to gelatinase B (92 kDa). The secretion of the two collagenases into the culture medium increased gradually over 10 days and the addition of 1 mM zinc chloride increased the production of alpha 2(I) collagenase. Human growth factors also induced the synthesis and secretion of alpha 2(I) collagenase: ep
